The Ph.D. program in Counselor Education and Supervision (CES) is known for its strong emphasis on research, advocacy and leadership, and professional practice and its graduates are recognized as excellent Counselor Educators. We endorse the scholar-practitioner model of graduate training in which students are exposed during their coursework to both the research and scholarly knowledge encompassing the field and the application of such knowledge to all aspects of professional practice as a counselor educator/researcher. The CES Ph.D. curriculum is designed to prepare students for positions of leadership in counselor education and research. Students are also encouraged to develop a special expertise in their chosen minor concentration area (e.g., Special Education, Psychology, Neuropsychology, Family Studies, and Law and Policy). Supervised field experiences are provided to ensure successful functioning in research, teaching and counseling supervision.

The mission of the Ph. D. degree Program in Counselor Education and Supervision at the University of Arizona is to prepare counselor educators and supervisors who identify as professional counselors and who are knowledgeable in all areas of applicable CACREP standards. Graduates consider their role to be that of leaders and advocates for social justice in addition to being scholars and educators who contribute to the advancement of the counseling profession in a diverse world. The graduates of our CES Program may therefore assume a variety of roles in connection with this mission. However, the majority of our students plan to fulfill the role of scholar-practitioner at the university level and teach within counselor education programs, an area of major need nationally.
